humble beginnings

Work Hall started by accident because of a failing company that couldn't afford to pay rent. Everyone had to be laid off, including myself. I was distraught. I had quit my M&A career to join the team only to find out that we had to pull the plug.

Having the entire office to myself while serving the last month, I could only frantically think of ways to move on. It was then that I convinced the landlord of the building to help me turn our office into a work space so that different businesses could share rent while at the same time collaborate and help each other grow.

My M&A experience taught me to work up my ThinkPad and run numbers but my vision for Work Hall taught me to look at the story behind those numbers. I spent the latter half of 2017 on researching, planning and validating the business model and subsequently raised seed investment from seasoned investors who believed in me more than they believed in the idea. Work Hall was founded in April 2018.

I've always believed people are magic; I deeply value the intangible power of strong bonds and relationships. The dream was always to build businesses and be around them. I had envisioned to build something that would make the whole greater than the sum of its parts. As human beings, our minds are hard-wired to tackle problems, even the ones that it didn't evolve to solve. I think the real problems to look for are the ones worth solving.

And that is why I built Work Hall.
